BERLIN, A CITY OF (EX)CHANGE

The opportunity for students at the University of Technology, Sydney (UTS) to further their career has never been brighter. The Global Exchange program offered by UTS is a prime example of one these opportunities. Over the past five years UTS has endeavoured to engage on the global scale and position itself at the forefront of global educational institutions. This reputation as a global has opened several doors for enterprising young students looking to set their sights further than their backyards.

One hopeful applicant to the Global Exchange program is Master of Architecture student Tim Gibson. Tim is currently in the process of applying to Technische Universität Berlin (TU Berlin). Located in Germany's vibrant capital TU Berlin is a leader in research working at the nexus between science and industry, a relationship that UTS also prides itself on.

When asked of his reason for applying to the exchange program Tim responded "It is such a fantastic opportunity, I didn't want to let it pass. I've been to Berlin twice before and have always wanted to go back. In this current job climate too, I think it will give my CV that something that distinguishes me from the rest."

Berlin has been a popular choice for UTS students over the past few years especially for those studying architecture. TU Berlin teaches many of their classes in English opening the door to more than just those who speak German. At the moment, several UTS students are studying at TU Berlin with more expected to head over in the New Year. The reason appears to be the drawcard of Berlin's lively urban culture. Tim agrees with this stating "Berlin is just such a welcoming city. There is a feeling in streets of Berlin that you just can't avoid. The city has had such a turbulent past and now they seem to want to make the most of the opportunities they have."

The applications for exchange in spring 2010 close on the 16th December, so we'll see then just how popular TU Berlin really has become.
